India's Economic Revival Confirmed By New Harvard

The rise of India as an Asian economic powerhouse is getting harder to ignore with a research team at Harvard University predicting that India could soon be growing at close to twice the annual rate of its arch-rival, China.

In India's case the export-complexity test, using 2013 data, points to the country enjoying an average annual growth rate of 7.9% to the year 2013. China, over the same period, using the same measuring system, is forecast to grow by 4.6% a year.

The study covers 128 countries and is designed to measure productive knowledge by assessing the range of goods and services exported with diversity pointing to an ability make products of increasing economic complexity with a workforce able to transfer its skills from one industry to another. The obvious trend is that countries with greater economic complexity, which essentially means a broader mix of industries, should grow faster than mono-dimensional countries such as those overly dependent on raw material exports, such as oil-exporting countries. Tipping India to comfortable outstrip China over the next decade is only one aspect of the CID's forecast, another aspect is that the 4.6% growth rate is well below the 6% predicted by the International Monetary Fund and the Chinese Government.
